WASHINGTON SET A-TALKING

Supreme Court Has Now Four
Civil War Veterans — Two Yanks and Two Rebs.

By Ernest G. Walker.
Mail Special to The Advertiser.

WASHINGTON, January 31.—The White House has certainly been leading off in interest at the threshold of the New Year. President Taft, not congress, has been winning the daily headlines. The lawmakers have attracted attention chiefly, as they journeyed to the big, square, white walled building adjoining the President's residence and as they pushed inside the big oval of the "talk" in over.

For the President has been making things hum all through the holidays and even into the period when congress began again to deliberate. It has become a trite saying that the ponderous wheels of legislation move slowly at the start. Their movement was almost imperceptible for quite a time in early December. There is hardly more momentum now but all that will change with so many people on the ground, with plans prepared for a winter of work. Those ever recurring appropriation bills, calling for a billion dollars of the country's money every year, alone suffice to give every regular session of congress a good round task.

Accordingly it has been well that President Taft has filled the public mind with a few ideas about the current necessities of government, that he has been calling in the senators and representatives, railroad presidents, captains of industry and the like and discussing programs. The days of blizzards and severe weather run into mild days, with the slush and the snow upon the asphalt and the President was still grinding away at the conferences, which began in November after the western return, and at those special messages, one upon corporations and another upon conservation. No golf at Chevy Chase with three inches of snow upon the slushy suburban roads, but plenty of tramping on foot. The President has not been at a loss for relaxation from the cares of office. He was up early, drilled away at business and many an afternoon when the sun was getting low in the west he put on his old clothes and started out for a tramp that would have done credit even to the athletic Roosevelt.

Is a Walker.

Indeed during the holidays and early January, President Taft has established his reputation as a pedestrian. It is notable how a few presidential stunts of that kind set people to talking and even overtop in general interest the graver things of state. Roosevelt was a great walker, but he preferred to walk in Rock Creek Park or in Maryland or Virginia. He almost invariably rode in a carriage out to the city limits and then began his tramping in the open country. He did not care much about walking in the town. He would walk to church on an occasional Sunday, but a stroll down Pennsylvania avenue, the most important thoroughfare in town, or along F street through the heart of the shopping district, did not especially appeal to him. President Taft, on the other hand, likes to walk in town. The provided thoroughfare appeals to him. He has been more on Pennsylvania avenue, F street and other of the principal thoroughfares of the city during the last month than all of his predecessors since Grant's time. He has not only walked the streets just as any private citizen would, going where he pleased, but he has walked into stores to shop for articles that he wanted and the latest was a visit to the New Willard Hotel to meet an old friend, Horace H. Lurton, whom he has just elevated to the Supreme Bench.

Is Left Alone.

It has long been recognized at the White House that a President can safely go almost anywhere in Washington, provided his going has not been advertised. Washington people are not so curious as many others, who see less of addition. To be sure they crane their necks when they note the President on the sidewalk, but they will not form a crowd around him when he passes or admire something in a show window. It is a great city of cranks but there is almost no danger of the President encountering them, when he makes up his mind about four o'clock in the afternoon that in a few minutes he will go out for a walk. If any forward persons were disposed to annoy the President and appeal to him for anything, he would be politely shunted aside by Captain Holt, the army aid, who always walks with the President.

An Awful Precedent.

Many tongues have been wagging because the President went to a hotel to call upon the new associate justice. That was a violation of all the precedents and the conventionalities. The President is supposed to make no calls like that. Men come to him, he does not go to them. But after all it was only a call upon an old friend with whom he served upon the United States supreme court bench for seven years.

The New Justice.

The coming of Justice Lurton has been much advertised, more so than that of any of his colleagues upon the Supreme Bench in recent years. The junior justice next to Lurton, Associate Justice Moody, was nominated while he was serving as attorney general and was therefore the transfer from one place to another of an official with

of the United States Supreme Court

whom Washington was already used to. Lurton, Justice William R. Day, of Ohio, was transferred from the circuit court, like Justice Lurton, but he had been in Washington as secretary of state, and therefore was no stranger. Justice Lurton, while he had been in Washington before his nomination, was practically a stranger here, for all of his official service has been in the sixth judicial circuit, comprising Ohio, Michigan, Kentucky, and Tennessee. Then the voluminous discussion about him in the newspapers, extending over a period of several months, in itself made him something of a celebrity. Few men have ever come to the Supreme Court under such circumstances. He was almost nominated for the Supreme Court by President Roosevelt, on the recommendation of Mr. Taft, then secretary of war. He was a Confederate soldier, who fell into the hands of the Union army, was sent to prison and released by President Lincoln on the personal appeal of his mother, who came to Washington and found a way, in spite of great obstacles, to reach the President. Accordingly, Justice Lurton has figured in the affairs of four administrations, for it was President Cleveland who made him a circuit judge.

Civil War Veterans.

His nomination to the court means that four of the nine justices are men of Civil War records. Two of them were Union soldiers, Justice Harlan raised the Tenth Kentucky Infantry regiment, which he commanded. He served in Gen. George H. Thomas' division, but resigned from the army in the spring of 1863, owing to the death of his father, although his name at that time was before the senate for confirmation as a brigadier-general. Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes went to the front as a lieutenant in the Twentieth Massachusetts Infantry, when a young Harvard graduate, was shot through the breast at Ball's Bluff in March, 1862; was soon commissioned captain, was wounded in the neck at Antietam and in the heel at Mary's Heights. The latter portion of his military service was aide-de-camp to Brig. Gen. H. G. Wright. He gained the brevets of major, lieutenant colonel, and colonel.

The other Confederate soldier of the Supreme Court is Mr. Justice White, who in all his biographies from the time that he entered the United States senate has contented himself with the simple assertion that he "served in the Confederate army."

Forces Even.

With the Civil War forces of the Supreme Bench now evenly matched as to numbers, it is conceivable that the tedious labors of the conference room will be enlivened on occasion by numerous interesting sallies from behind the ramparts of leather-bound volumes. Nearly all the justices are good story tellers and love a bristling anecdote. Colonel Harlan is one of the best at that sort of a feat. Colonel Holmes is more reserved, but he, on occasion, can tell a story well. They can keep up the side of the commissioned officers, while High Private White and High Private Lurton, both of whom have the southern gift of being entertaining conversationalists, can enrich the information of the court with experiences in the trenches and on the wearisome marches about.

"ST. VALENTINE'S VILLAGE" BUILDING

The young people of the Hawaiian congregation of St. Andrew's Cathedral are planning to give a unique entertainment next Saturday evening. It will be known as "St. Valentine's Village," and will be held in the Davies Memorial Hall, which will be arranged to represent an old-time English village. There will be an inn, postoffice, bank and shops for the sale of valentines, shoes, candies, and other goods and goodies. The entertainment centers around the sending of valentines.

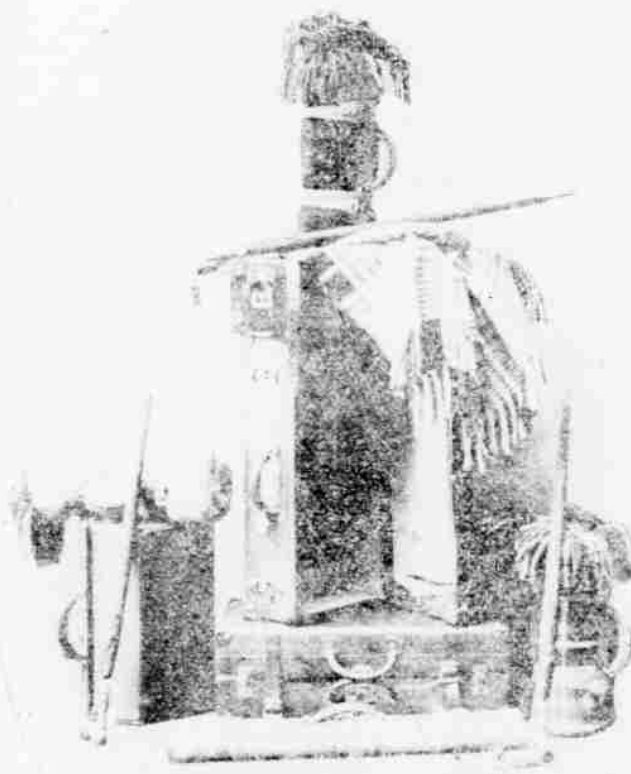

The entrance to the village will be by the door on Emma street and visitors will find themselves almost immediately at the desk of the inn, where "guests" will register. They will proceed along the main street to the bank where one can obtain the currency of the village. Then at one of the shops one visits buys a valentine for best beloved or friend, and mails it at the postoffice. Every half-hour there will be a mail delivery, so that after mailing the valentine the sender will not have to wait long before seeing the pleased smile of one's friend as he, or she, receives the token of remembrance. Other things besides valentines may be sent through the postoffice, or by special delivery messenger.

There will also be some entertaining side shows which will be in the nature of amusements. If one becomes hungry, supper can be had in the dining room of the Davies Memorial Hall, and if thirsty the village well will provide beverage.

The workers in the village will be in costume. All members of both congregations of St. Andrew's Cathedral and the friends, are cordially invited to partake of the fun at "St. Valentine's Village" Saturday night next.

TRADE BOARD MAY SELECT PRINCESS

Hilo Tribune.—It appears from the Honolulu papers that the Hilo board of trade will be asked by those in charge of the preparations for the Floral Parade on Washington's birthday, Feb. 22, to select a local beauty to represent this island as its "Princess." Last year a young Honolulu lady was selected to represent the Big Island on a similar occasion, but the board of trade paid the bill incidentally thereto. While so far the board has received no notification in regard to the matter, it appears certain that the time will come shortly when the business men will be called upon to select the beauties of the island and to select therefrom the one who pleases them most.
